Grant provides a forum

The Modern Red Schoolhouse came to Columbia County's educational community this week and really solidified the process of professional development among the county's public school teachers.

The customized professional teaching method seminar allows specific training for classroom teachers in a lighter setting that focuses on improvement of their individual talents and deliveries. It also helps teachers align the sequencing of their curriculum to help transfer students adjust.

Overall, it's a very good all-around seminar that benefited many teachers in the Columbia County School District.

And, it's funded through a three-year Comprehensive School Reform Grant from the federal government. Any time the local public school district can benefit from a seminar that is funded by the government, we're all for it.

The grant is intended to provide funds for programs that improve the quality of education in public schools. This is Columbia County's first year in the program and already it is paying dividends.

We support the school system and its desire to improve the quality of education for our children.
